ATTACK OF THE FURBALL

A Christina Starspeeder Story

By Jarrett J. Krosoczka & Amy Ignatow

Welcome back to Jedha! We're so glad that most of you have returned to delve deeper into your apprenticeships. Part of learning the ways of the Force is knowing when it is not calling to you, and so you may see that some of your classmates have chosen not to return. This is very normal, and we must wish them well on their new journeys.

In other news, the commissary is closed until further notice due to a minor culinary septic droid mishap, so make use of your ration kits, yum!

HEPTADAY

It feels good to be back on the Faravahar! After the mess on Canto Bight, I half expected the Masters would want to keep us off of missions, but I should have known that's not the Jedi way. Do or do not, there is no try. Even after a fight with some Gamorrean guards and a Hutt.

I'm definitely more comfortable now on the Faravahar than I was at first, even though I swear Q-13 is really working hard to make sure I don't get too comfortable.

I wonder how Victor is doing on Devaron. He's probably frustrated because the planet is too heavily forested for him to fly a speeder.

And I've heard that his Jedi Master, Iyawa is really impressive and hard to please. Then again, not everyone is as lucky as I am to be perfectly matched with the right Jedi Master.

Did you test the oxygen masks before we left?

I was just about to do that!

Be sure to test
them on something with a brain.

We talked with a farmer and his family, and it really made me think about how easy it was for us to grow up on Naboo. Victor and I lived really close to other kids, there was water and food everywhere, and everyone got along. On Tatooine, the farm kids maybe see their friends once every week or two, and leaving their communities is really dangerous. If they don't get attacked by Tusken Raiders, they still have to worry about their speeders breaking down in the middle of the desert. If they get stuck somewhere ... that's it for them.

Little Cody has never even seen a lake.
