WELCOME TO THE CARTOONISTS CLUB!

A cartoonists club is a fun way for artists, writers, and makers to share and celebrate their love for storytelling with pictures.

You're building a safe and inspiring space for kids to follow their imaginations, make mistakes, form friendships, and discover new things. Whether your club members are new to creating comics or they already make them, everyone can practice their drawing, writing, and collaboration skills.

This guide includes many of the drawing and writing activities that appear in The Cartoonists Club book. Use the activities and resources in this guide to plan your club meetings or supplement your ideas. You can use them all in order to strengthen your comics-making skills, or pick and choose the ones you're most excited about! Ask club members about their interests, too. What do club members want to learn about making comics? Take turns planning meeting activities so that everyone feels included.

All you need to get started is paper, pens or pencils, and a few friends. You can explore the activities in this guide with basic home, school, or office supplies. Have fun!

GET INSPIRED!

Raina Telgemeier

I suggest reading as many types of comic books, graphic novels, and comic strips as you can get your hands on. Different creators do TOTALLY different things with the medium, and you might find inspiration where you least expect it! I only read newspaper comic strips growing up, but in high school and college, I started to read graphic novels, comic book series, manga, and zines. Each of them inspired me to try writing and drawing comics in different ways. Eventually I settled on book-length graphic novels as my storytelling art form of choice, but it was fun to experiment and figure out what I liked best. Even now, I still do short comics for online platforms, make journal comics, and participate in all kinds of fun drawing exercises with friends just for fun!

Scott McCloud

It's so much fun to find other kids who want to draw and tell stories just like you do, and having something in common like that is wonderful. But there will probably be a lot of differences, too. Everybody has their own style and their own point of view about making art. Be ready to listen and learn from those differences. My friend Kurt Busiek, who's an award-winning comics writer now, convinced me to start reading comics when we were in seventh grade—and we argued all the time! But we're both better at what we do now because of it.

MEET THE CARTOONISTS CLUB MEMBERS!

Add a picture of yourself and your creator bio!

In the blank box, draw a self-portrait in any style you like and add your name too! Next to it, share some details about yourself. You could start with a quotation or catchphrase you always say, a description of yourself, what you love creating, what you want to do better, and what you dream of becoming.

EXPRESS YOURSELF!

Art and Lynda study, practice, and teach the rest of The Cartoonists Club how to show facial expressions and body language in their drawings.

Start with the six simple faces that Art shows the club on page 146. These faces show how the eyes, mouth, and eyebrows of faces change to show universal expressions like joy, sadness, fear, disgust, anger, and surprise. Practice drawing them at least a few times. Next, combine elements from these common emotions to show more complicated expressions like disappointment. How can you expand and deepen these facial expressions with additional details? Practice drawing different facial expressions.

BONUS: Lynda describes body language as the poses or shapes our bodies make when feeling different emotions. How can you change a character's body language by making them stand straighter, slump down, expand, shrink, or shift their personal space? Using your own paper, practice changing characters' body language by altering their shape and position.

STORY IDEA GENERATOR

Howard thinks he has no story ideas. Makayla thinks she has too many!

Use this list of words (or come up with your own) to generate your own stories. Pick one word from each column—People, Places, and Things—and come up with an idea based around those three words. In the space below, or on a separate sheet of paper, explore how a comic using these three words could work in different genres. For example, brainstorm a memoir comic, then use the same three words to draft a superhero comic. How many ideas can you come up with from three words?

People

artist	monster
astronaut	scientist
bus driver	singer
chef	soccer player
coach	spy
dancer	video gamer
detective	writer
dog trainer	YouTuber
dragon	zookeeper
explorer	zombie
farmer	robot

Places

airport	hospital
amusement park	kitchen
auditorium	laboratory
bakery	moon
basement	public library
beach	rooftop
dentist's office	secret hideout
driving school	swimming pool
farm	train tunnel
forest	underwater cave
grocery store	zoo

Things

ant hill	graphic novel
backpack	lawn mower
bunk bed	lizard tank
cardboard	motorcycle
chicken nugget	pajamas
chopsticks	pizza
drum set	shopping cart
flashlight	snowmobile
flower pot	trampoline
glass of milk	toy piano
guitar	washing machine

THUMBS UP FOR THUMBNAILS!

Many artists use a technique called “thumbnailing” to plan their comics without getting stuck on the details too early in the process.

Thumbnails are small, quick, rough sketches that enable you to quickly visualize the composition or layout of a panel, scene, or page—and make changes as needed—before you put a ton of effort into creating full sketches or final art!

Use the space below to practice thumbnailing an idea from the Story Idea Generator activity or another story. Start by chunking your story into panels like Makayla and Howard do in the library (page 27). Then make a rough sketch using stick figures to show the action you imagine for each panel, like Lynda does (page 115). How does the thumbnailing process keep your creativity flowing? What might you change from your initial layout ideas when you draw the next draft of your comic?

BEHIND THE ZINES!

A zine (or fanzine) is a handmade, self-published magazine or minicomic.

Art learns how to make zines from their dad, then teaches the rest of the club. You will need blank paper, a pencil or any writing utensil, scissors, and a stapler. You don't need an elaborate story. Start small.

GROUP ACTIVITIES FOR YOUR CARTOONISTS CLUB

Here are a few more activities you can do with your club!
Ask an adult for help as needed.

1. Inspiring Creators!

Who are the cartoonists, writers, or other creators you like to read? Who inspires you to make comics? Dedicate a club meeting to sharing your inspirations! Take turns teaching the rest of the club about the role models whose comics and art you enjoy. You can share examples of their work and the stories of their lives.

2. Story Starter Collage!

Collect photos from magazines or websites. Ask family members for donations of old magazines and photos. Spread your photo collection face down on a table and invite club members to draw any two photos. Create a story using these two images as a story starter. (You could also use an approved online image generator, a book with many images like an illustrated dictionary or encyclopedia, or story cubes!)

3. Host an Art Show!

Create a gallery of your art (online or in person) and invite family and friends to see your club in action! Share the comics, zines, and stories that you have created and tell guests about your club. Ask an adult to help you host your celebration, so you can talk with guests and they can help supervise the event.

4. Comics Collaborators!

Comics are not always created solo! Refer to the Comics Jobs section on pages 272–273 of The Cartoonists Club to learn about the many people and roles that go into comics-making. Assign each group member a role, develop a project timeline, and have each group member complete their respective task(s) to create a collaborative comic!

5. Artistic Choices!

Have one person (a club member or an adult) choose a graphic novel the group hasn't already read and write out a script from one of the scenes in advance of the club meeting. With only the script for reference, discuss and sketch out how you think the scene could look by figuring out where all the characters, balloons, objects, etc. could go on the page(s). You can do this individually or in small groups. Once finished, compare your sketches with the actual book to see how your choices might be similar to or different from what the book creators did!

6. Make Quanto Comics!

Give each club member a sheet of blank paper. Have each person quickly write a title (or draw a logo) at the top of the page. Then, swap papers with another club member! Quickly draw a comic of your own on their paper, based on their title or logo. You can repeat this process as many times as you like in the time available! Don't stress the details: remember, quanto comics are all about the quantity, not the quality. You don't have to draw detailed panels or finish your story! Don't be afraid to make "a beautiful mess" (page 80). See how The Cartoonists Club makes quanto comics starting on page 70!
